

As a dad with shared custody of a child I see that lawyers having access to my data could be easily blown out if a custody battle to eventuate. In some instances in custody battles (not my scenario) accusations of child abuse of all forms are made, but may not necessarily be true and correct. In these situations there would no evidence to convict a person. However I can see data being manipulated in custody battles and cases potentially being decided over data obtained. I just see that it would make it harder for fathers to see their kids. 21 dads... Google it. 21 dads take their life due to custody related battles every week.

And only to make it harder because they look at questionable dating site that maybe used against them. Nah nah. That number will only go up from 21 if lawyers have access to this data.
