

Data gathered through the Data Retention bill should not be made available to civil cases. Allowing it would enable corporations who already make frivolous copyright claims often over content they do not own to gather personal data about citizens. This would violate peoples privacy and provide corporations with data they could abuse for marketing purposes.

Under no circumstances should this data be made available in civil cases.

--

Richard Stern